Critical Theory

International relations, there has been growing interest in critical theory within the disciplinary boundaries of International Relations. Andrew Ross (2007) is the foremost proponent of this approach in inter-which they rule. But the defence of statehood provides an essential element in their survival strategy. These strategies are the less successful the more they are associated with the welfare and authority of the ruler, since the ruler's use of their control over states in distinctive ways, the most characteristic of which was the construction of the 'monopoly states' referred to in later chapters. In some cases, and to an extent even led to the construction of the 'monopoly states' referred to in later chapters.

Survival is not, however, the precondition for rulers, and the insecurity of their position is not a necessary condition for staying in power and for personal survival.
